From the Editor

Trace Lund

The beauty of an academic journal lies in the efforts given to bring it to fruition, and this eighth edition of Intuition has been no exception. After many hours and plenty of work, we present it to you, the reader. In the time and effort spent, many changes have taken place. Within the journal, you will now find portraits of our authors included with their articles, as well as some new formatting and other choices we hope will add to the journal's overall presentation. Behind the scenes, we have had changes in advisement, leadership, processes, and a near complete overturn in our staff which has brought new, fresh views on the journal. We look forward to each of these continuing to improve the journal in the future.

Many individuals deserve thanks for helping bring this volume to publication: our past editors and advisors who left us a great place to start; our new editing staff, including our incoming editors-in-chief Cara Duchene and Melissa Woodhouse; and our new faculty adviser Dr. Ed Gantt. All have been a great help and strength to the journal.

Additional thanks to our wonderful authors who have given a great effort in editing and honing already strong articles, as well as faculty members who have helped review and advise. Both have proved invaluable in the journal's progress. Lastly, special thanks to Michael Davison and Gina Prows, both of whom have had an immense impact for the better on this edition. I can't say thank you enough for your efforts.

This volume, "Baby Eight," is a witness to your hard work.

Happy reading,
