

Insights: The Newsletter of the Neal A. Maxwell Institute for Religious Scholarship

Volume 23 | Number 3

Article 5

January 2003

Full Issue

Follow this and additional works at: <https://scholarsarchive.byu.edu/insights>

Part of the Mormon Studies Commons, and the Religious Education Commons

Recommended Citation

(2003) "Full Issue," Insights: The Newsletter of the Neal A. Maxwell Institute for Religious Scholarship: Vol. 23: No. 3, Article 5.

Available at: <https://scholarsarchive.byu.edu/insights/vol23/iss3/5>

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Journals at BYU ScholarsArchive. It has been accepted for inclusion in Insights: The Newsletter of the Neal A. Maxwell Institute for Religious Scholarship by an authorized editor of BYU ScholarsArchive. For more information, please contact ellen_amatangelo@byu.edu.

Insights

A WINDOW ON THE ANCIENT WORLD VOLUME 23 | 2003

Number 3

<http://farms.byu.edu>

Yale Conference on Mormon Perspectives

Between 250 and 300 people took part on 27–29 March 2003 in a conference in New Haven, Connecticut, devoted to the subject of “God, Humanity, and Revelation: Perspectives from Mormon Philosophy and History.” The conference, hosted by the Divinity School of Yale University, was organized by Kenneth West, a Latter-day Saint graduate student there. The Institute for the Study and Preservation of Ancient Religious Texts was one of the conference sponsors.

Speakers at the meetings, which were held mostly in the Marquand Chapel at Sterling Divinity Quadrangle, included several names familiar to FARMS readers. For example, Richard L. Bushman, Gouverneur Morris Professor of American History emeritus at Columbia University, who is working on a major biography of the Prophet Joseph Smith that is planned for publication in 2005, delivered an opening keynote address on Thursday evening, reflecting on the subject of “Joseph Smith’s Visions.” Professor Bushman argued, among other things, that Latter-day Saints have shown little interest in what other Christian traditions call “systematic theology,” but, instead, have focused on stories from the past that teach both doctrine and proper conduct. This was a recurrent theme at the conference, most notably, perhaps, in James E. Faulconer’s paper the following morning, which was provocatively entitled “Why a Mormon Won’t Drink Coffee but Might Drink Coke: The Atheological Character of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.” Kathleen Flake, a member of the Church of Jesus Christ who teaches at Vanderbilt University Divinity School, in Nashville, Tennessee, spoke on the related subject of “Joseph Smith’s Narrative Theology.”

Other Latter-day Saint speakers, however, did treat issues that came close, at least, to the territory typically covered by systematic theology. Truman G. Madsen, for instance, discussed “The Eternal Nature of Persons”; David L. Paulsen and Blake T. Ostler outlined and argued for a number of their own personal “articles of faith” regarding “God, Our Father”; and Daniel C. Peterson maintained, in his paper “Mormonism and the Trinity,” that Latter-day Saints, although they reject the “orthodox” theories of the unity of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost that were enshrined in the creeds of the fourth century, are indeed trinitarian Christians, properly understood.

continued on page 3

FARMS Review Probes Cowdery, Chosenness, Chiasmus, and More

Keeping step with its expanding role, The FARMS Review sports a new title and cover design. Further departures from tradition are the introduction, written for the first time by someone other than the founding editor; a book notes section; and a study relating to chiasmus that not only gives an update on contemporary works on the subject but also surveys those available in the 1820s.

In the introduction to the Review, Louis Midgley ably comments on tiresome “countercult” efforts to marginalize or evangelize the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. He notes with approval some instances of civil discussion with conservative Protestants but decries the false assumptions of evangelicals who imagine that engaging Latter-day Saints in “interfaith dialogue” (too often a euphemism for publishing ranting diatribes against the church) will cause the church to “modify [its] faith to fit evangelical notions of Christian orthodoxy.”

Larry E. Morris reviews three books that probe the character of Oliver Cowdery. Morris notes that the authors rely on many sound secondary sources to the neglect of relevant historical context and critical primary sources. Point for point, Morris reconstructs the historical setting and weighs each author’s conclusions against letters and statements by Cowdery and others.

continued on page 3

The Baptism of Little Children in Pre-Columbian Mesoamerica

In a letter to his son Moroni, Mormon warns against the practice of baptizing little children. He identifies two false assumptions of his day used to justify infant baptism: little children are born with sin (see Moroni 8:8) and will suffer divine punishment in hell if they die without having been baptized (see Moroni 8:13). While the exact nature of this aberrant practice is unknown, it was apparently common enough among the Nephites of Mormon's day to warrant swift and unequivocal prophetic censure. Mormon describes the rite as particularly wicked and erroneous in light of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

When the Spanish arrived in the New World in the mid-16th century, Mesoamericans were practicing several different kinds of water purification rituals that involved young children. Bernardino de Sahagún reported that the Aztec midwives ritually bathed newborn children, invoking the cleansing power of the goddess Chalchiuhtlicue. Implicit in the practice was the assumption that infants may inherit evil and impurity at birth, as can be seen from the words the midwife spoke during the ceremony:

Perhaps he cometh laden with evil; who knoweth the manner in which he cometh laden with the evil burdens of his mother, of his father? With what blotch, what filth, what evil of the mother, of the father doth the baby come laden? He is in thy hands. Receive him, cleanse him, wash him, for he is especially entrusted to thee, for he is delivered into thy hands. Remove the blotch, the filth, the evil of his mother, of his father! And possibly he cometh laden with vile [sic]. May that with which he cometh laden, the evil, the bad, be washed away, be destroyed. . . . May the filth be washed away! May it be washed away, may it be destroyed in the way that has been assigned.¹

The midwife's prayer also reflects the belief that infants can be cleansed of those inherent sins and impurities through ritual washing with water: "May she [the goddess Chalchiuhtlicue] receive thee! May she wash thee, may she cleanse thee! . . . May she cleanse thy heart; may she make it fine, good! May she give thee fine, good conduct!"² After the baptism it was said, "Now the baby liveth again; he is born again; now he becometh clean, he becometh pure again."³

The Codex Nuttall, a pre-Conquest painted picture book from the area of Oaxaca, Mexico, shows what appears to be a Mixtec baptism by immersion. The drawing depicts a woman underwater emerging from a tortoise shell, an iconographic statement of rebirth (see the accompanying illustration).⁴

The Mixtec Codex Nuttall from ancient Mexico depicts a woman being reborn (baptized) underwater. © Dover Publications, Inc.

According to Friar Diego de Landa, the Maya of Yucatán practiced a pre-Columbian water purification ritual known as caput sihil, meaning "to be born anew or again." No one could marry or become a Maya priest without having been thus purified. Children may have been baptized in this manner as early as three years of age.⁵ Of the ancient Maya community once located in present-day Mérida, Mexico, Landa recorded, "[I]f anyone died without baptism they believed he would have to suffer more torments in hell than a baptized person."⁶

Thus the idea that little children who die unbaptized will suffer torment for their inherited evil or impurity was not peculiar to American discourse in the early 19th century, as some detractors of the Book of Mormon have claimed.⁷ Rather, apparently it was current in pre-Columbian Mesoamerica as well. From the Book of Mormon, we learn that the beliefs underlying the practice of baptizing little children were known in the New World at least as early as the fourth century A.D.

Notes

1. Fray Bernardino de Sahagún, Florentine Codex: General History of the Things of New Spain, trans. Arthur J. O. Anderson and Charles E. Dibble (1969), bk. VI, sec. 32, pp. 175–76.
2. Ibid., 175.

3. Ibid., 202.
4. The Codex Nuttall: A Picture Manuscript from Ancient Mexico, ed. Zelia Nuttall (1975), folio 16.
5. See Alfred M. Tozzer, trans., Landa's Relación de las Cosas de Yucatán (1941), 102.
6. Ibid., n. 462.
7. Alexander Campbell, for example, made this claim in “Delusions,” Millennial Harbinger 2 (7 February 1831): 93.

By Matthew P. Roper

Conference continued from page 1

Terryl L. Givens, author of the notable recent Oxford University Press book By the Hand of Mormon: The American Scripture That Launched a New World Religion, spoke on “The Book of Mormon and the Future(s) of Mormonism.” He observed that the factual historicity of the Book of Mormon is the peculiar “scandal” of Mormonism, just as the literal, physical resurrection of Jesus is the “scandal” of Christianity in general, and argued that the Book of Mormon finds its full power only among those who accept the supernatural account of its origins offered by the Prophet Joseph Smith and endorsed by the Witnesses to the plates.

Other speakers treated such topics as the vital place of the Bible in Mormonism, Book of Mormon teachings on the redemption of fallen humanity, Latter-day Saint Christology, the location of Mormon theology on the American religious landscape, and the future of studies of Latter-day Saint doctrine. One panel discussion concentrated on plural marriage and the Latter-day Saint family.

Most of the respondents to the presentations—including philosophers Stephen Davis and Nicholas Wolterstorff, historian Ann Taves, and British theologian and social scientist Douglas Davies—were not Latter-day Saints. They represented diverse disciplines such as philosophy, theology, American religious history, and biblical studies and were drawn from a variety of institutions. Exchanges between presenters and respondents were uniformly respectful, even friendly, although respect did not necessarily guarantee agreement. Conversations continued, among both participants and members of the audience, during lunches and dinners throughout the course of the program.

continued on page 4

FARMS Review continued from page 1

Readers will appreciate the fuller picture of Cowdery’s character that emerges in this review essay.

Readers interested in the intersection of Mormon and Jewish thought will enjoy the illuminating background information in Jeffrey R. Chadwick’s review of Covenants and Chosenness in Judaism and Mormonism, edited by Raphael Jospe, Truman G. Madsen, and Seth Ward; and Jews and Mormons: Two Houses of Israel, by Frank J. Johnson and Rabbi William J. Leffler. Chadwick also reviews Harris Lenowitz’s The Jewish Messiahs: From the Galilee to Crown Heights, a fascinating look at Jews who during their lifetimes were thought to be the promised Messiah, beginning with Jesus and ending with Menachem Mendel Schneerson in New York.

Noel B. Reynolds and John L. Sorenson separately review Terryl L. Givens’s By the Hand of Mormon: The American Scripture That Launched a New World Religion. Reynolds sketches the book’s contents and praises Givens’s originality of thought and exemplary professional approach that helped it “[break] through the publishing barrier that has prevented other related manuscripts from being brought out by leading academic presses.” Sorenson adds, “The combination of Givens’s careful scholarship, felicitous writing, and wide scope combine to make By the Hand of Mormon one of a handful of must-read, must-own volumes for serious students of the Book of Mormon.”

John W. Welch reviews the rise of chiasmus in biblical studies in the 1820s, commencing with works continued on page 4

Conference continued from page 3

Participants in the conference seem universally to have viewed it as a success, and not a few, indeed, expect that it may prove to be something of a breakthrough event. Heretofore, Mormonism's radically and richly unique point of view on central doctrinal issues has generally been overlooked by outside scholarship, with Latter-day Saints figuring in most histories of American religion or of Christianity as little more than a mildly interesting footnote to the westward expansion of the United States in the 19th century. It is reasonable to hope, however, that this might change.

BYU philosophy professor James Faulconer has signaled his intention to work with Kenneth West in gathering up at least some of the presentations and preparing them for publication in book form.  —reported by Daniel C. Peterson published in London by John Jebb (1820) and Thomas Boys (1824 and 1825). Adding to his previous statements about these books, Welch surveys the reviews that evaluated them in contemporaneous British periodicals. It is also discussed how Thomas Horne's massive critical study of the Bible included a few pages about Jebb in its fourth (1825) edition, rather than in its 1836 edition, as had been previously thought. Moreover, the 1825 edition was published in London and also in Philadelphia. Interestingly, Joseph Smith owned a copy of that 1825 edition, but he obtained it in January 1834. Welch concludes that while some knowledge of chiasmus existed in America in 1829, there is still "a very low probability that Joseph Smith knew anything about chiasmus" when translating the Book of Mormon.

FARMS Review continued from page 3

This latest issue of the Review (vol. 15, no. 1) also evaluates three books on the Book of Abraham and several other publications. It includes an index (by author, title, and reviewer) to last year's double issue. To obtain a copy of the new Review, use the enclosed mail-order form or visit the Bookstore section of the FARMS Web site.

INSTITUTE NEWS

New Director to Guide Institute

Noel B. Reynolds has been appointed director of the Institute. A professor of political science and a past president of FARMS, he recently completed a five-year term as associate academic vice president for undergraduate studies at BYU. Further coverage on this change in leadership will appear in a future issue of Insights.

Insights

A Window on the Ancient World
Volume 23 | Number 3 | 2003

A Publication of the Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies (FARMS)

Institute for the Study and Preservation of Ancient Religious Texts
Brigham Young University

Institute Board

Douglas M. Chabries, Chair	John E. Clark John F. Hall Gary R. Hooper Daniel Oswald
David R. Seely, Vice-Chair	Donald W. Parry Daniel C. Peterson Michael D. Rhodes Stephen D. Ricks
Noel B. Reynolds, Director	Andrew C. Skinner John W. Welch

Insights Staff

Don L. Brugger, Managing Editor
Jacob D. Rawlins, Associate Editor
Kelly Krapfl, Editorial Intern

FARMS is part of Brigham Young University's Institute for the Study and Preservation of Ancient Religious Texts. As such, it encourages and supports research on the Book of Mormon, the Book of Abraham, the Bible, other ancient scripture, and related subjects. Under the FARMS imprint, the Institute publishes and distributes titles in these areas for the benefit of scholars and interested Latter-day Saint readers.

Primary research interests at FARMS include the history, language, literature, culture, geography, politics, and law relevant to ancient scripture. Although such subjects are of secondary importance when compared with the spiritual and eternal messages of scripture, solid research and academic perspectives can supply certain kinds of useful information, even if only tentatively, concerning many significant and interesting questions about scripture.

FARMS makes interim and final reports about this research available widely, promptly, and economically. These publications are peer reviewed to ensure that scholarly standards are met. The proceeds from the sale of these materials are used to support further research and publications. As a service to teachers and students of the scriptures, research results are distributed in both scholarly and popular formats.

For more information or to order publications, contact us at
P.O. Box 7113, University Station, Provo, UT 84602
1-800-327-6715 (or 801-422-9229)
Web site: farms.byu.edu