EDITOR IN CHIEF & MANAGING EDITOR'S NOTE

We are honored by the privilege and extraordinary opportunity it has been to oversee the publication of the 2018 edition of the Brigham Young University Prelaw Review. As new legal issues arise each year, we feel it is essential for students to understand and add their voices to these important issues. We believe the 2018 Prelaw Review staff have met this goal through their hard work and commitment. Each article is refined, well-researched, and strongly argued. They add to important conversations on legal topics ranging from self-driving cars to immigration, medical malpractice, and water rights.

Authors and editors for this year's Prelaw Review were selected in July of 2017. In their applications authors submitted drafts or outlines with proposed arguments and the relevant areas of research. They were later paired with an editor to assist them in the writing process. Then, with the help of their editors, authors spent the next seven months researching, writing, and refining arguments. Throughout this process each team overcame numerous challenges as they worked to improve their arguments. The resulting journal is a tribute to each member's dedication and individual commitment to excellence.

Each team sought after legal professionals to better understand and address their topics. We wish to extend a heartfelt thank you to each of the professors who took the time to help lift this journal to a higher plane of quality. We wish to thank Kendall Orton, J. Lyons, Maddy Sharp, and Michelle Beus for their efforts in bringing this all together. We are extremely grateful for Kris Tina Carlston, for her time, and for her effort on behalf of this journal. We can sincerely say that without her help and guidance, this journal would not be what it is today. Finally, we wish to thank Abby Staker for formatting each paper prior to publication.

We are excited to present you with the 2018 edition of the Brigham Young University Prelaw Review. We wish each member of this year's staff the best of luck with future endeavors and thank them sincerely for the experience they helped to provide.
