El Mago Learnsto Fly

Heather B. Moore

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarsarchive.byu.edu/inscape

Part of the Arts and Humanities Commons

Recommended Citation

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by BYU ScholarsArchive. It has been accepted for inclusion in Inscape by an authorized editor of BYU ScholarsArchive. For more information, please contact scholarsarchive@byu.edu, ellen_amatangelo@byu.edu.
He weaves stories from shadows of women, from corn (the flesh of Mayan gods) from sudden roses and a pueblo in Peru on the ocean’s edge, where the people still wake up and walk to church through starlit streets. A trickster tells the truth, but tells it slant. Spanish incantations make me forget breathing is boring and blood beats without meaning to.

We are rich. Un árbol de oro, y es nuestro. Not just a golden tree, but a sky blushing at our indiscretion. How could we walk so far through crackling leaves along a trickling creek waiting for winter’s rain and not know our ancestors are speaking to us? How could we come across a burning bush and not listen?

We walk through fields so green, I think it’s spring, even though December’s first wind roughs up the river, rustles through ruddy blueberry fields and bare hazelnut orchards, combs climbing vineyards and rows of Christmas trees, and finally crests the fir-fringed hills, catching us full in the face: despertaos, vivid, amad, bailad, volad, os doy las alas. . . .

As we rise through the clouds, he’ll die content just holding my hand. I’ll guide him to his house full of windows and we'll watch the river turn silver miles below and volcanoes erupt with fresh snow
Moore

and the ocean burst itself a billion times against basalt-black cliffs, carving out a new cave.

Someone will have to make a treasure map.
Someone will have to tell a story.