Sleeping Out at the Farm

August nights in Wyoming raise a cold dew.
We return for clarity: visible heavens mapped with stars,
thick slush of the milky way across Salt River Range.

We lie before moonrise under grandmother-quilts, our bodies curved over feather ticks from the attic.
Through fences, my father's last few Angus—shipped to market—seem still to move, invisible and real.

Birthplace, pasture, creek bed, hills . . . we float with nebulae
as the east grows pale, cirrus moving in with a wafer moon.
We dissolve toward sleep with high-altitude cloud, our lives a faint cluster of plenty.
