Learning to Be a Woman

Marilyn Bushman-Carlton

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarsarchive.byu.edu/byusq

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://scholarsarchive.byu.edu/byusq/vol40/iss3/17

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by the All Journals at BYU ScholarsArchive. It has been accepted for inclusion in BYU Studies Quarterly by an authorized editor of BYU ScholarsArchive. For more information, please contact scholarsarchive@byu.edu, ellen_amatangelo@byu.edu.
Learning to Be a Woman

We watch our mother empty pockets for the wash, slide cookies into the oven, vacuum the avocado carpet, wipe dust from the kitchen sill, all with cube steaks frying, (baby sister tucked under her ribs) and singing a hymn front to back. She reigns in a cotton dress; smells of soup, shampoo and bleach.

She knows where it is, whose turn to be first, how to spell amnesia and cooperation, that carrots brighten our eyes.

We see her butter the edges, set one more plate, thaw chicken parts under the tap. When an aunt or neighbor stops by and Mother must sit, her hands reattach a black snap, shape meatloaf, measure paper for lining the shelves. Sometimes we’re shooed away. Little pigs have big ears, they say, but they laugh, and the house swells with the happiness of women. They hug both arms, bob forward and back, pink with glee.
Sometimes Mother wears lipstick, rubs lotion over her legs, dances her flesh
into an elastic girdle.

Sometimes radish roses and little cube cakes
dot kidney-shaped plates.
The club ladies say Oh! Shirley, your house is NEVER a mess, or Now, which one is this?
Is this one the twin?

Somehow we drew the straw (while our brothers sweat loudly outside) to be framed by flickering curtains or stiff winter ice on the glass, to sit very still on a kitchen stool
while Mother dips a comb in a glass and persuades our hair into curls.

—Marilyn Bushman-Carlton