Watermark: The Reservoir

From the new mountain highway, we have watched the narrow road below lapped up by the lake, water rising all the way to Hyde's place: now the tips of Lombardys point above water like sable brushes.

I am ten, and wood slabs float into haphazard rafts at Crescent Cove; I am certain they rise from barn roofs collapsing upward:

*Surely the road beneath still winds,
strange, stringy plants waving upward in the current where wild roses pale toward green light.*

*Aspens quake for a season under the ripples.
Persistent birds
bubble songs to the surface, holding to branches washed of leaves.*

*Trout from streams of Wind River Range find the limits of the lake exotic—
ground nests of larks hatch spectacular birds to climb the liquid sky.*
