1-1-2007

Pool of Aspen: After Forty Years

Dixie L. Partridge

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarsarchive.byu.edu/byusq

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://scholarsarchive.byu.edu/byusq/vol46/iss1/8

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by the All Journals at BYU ScholarsArchive. It has been accepted for inclusion in BYU Studies Quarterly by an authorized editor of BYU ScholarsArchive. For more information, please contact scholarsarchive@byu.edu, ellen_amatangelo@byu.edu.
Pool of Aspen

After Forty Years

“Camp where you can hear water.”

—my father

The grove in the lake now shimmers like hammered gold.
Farther on, the lake skin darkens, tightened by shadow and slate blue light before dusk, as though the water striders stitch its surface taut enough to be walked upon.

My father claimed he could walk on water as a child in hip boots worn by my grandfather when he died from a seizure, falling face down in a ditch before my father turned three.
I try to believe now in buoyancy—that yearning . . .

which connects to the farm, just sold, and to the field pond, gone before I was born.
That it might someday come back was my father’s dream and my own: his out of memory and drought, mine out of romance with bodies of water like this high unnamed lake where my brothers once brought me, where their pebbles turned the silt of the south end smoky, but the north side over rock stayed clear through any weather I’ve seen.

We might have spoken names like Slate Water, Smoke Cove . . . .
Now it’s Gold Lake below aspen, and I imagine waking in the dark to a pale glow of white trunks, autumn leaf-tremble discernible to night vision, where the outlet offers its faint pouring over all we name thirst.

—Dixie L. Partridge