Violet and Ruby are two sisters with a lot of stuff. Ever since they were little, they have collected the same things so they had two of each thing in their house. Ruby grows sick of being cramped and cluttered and decides to move out. She packs up her half of the collection and moves into her own house across town. She has the space she wants, but something is not quite right and Violet knows exactly what it is. Violet comes with a team to pick up Ruby's house and move it to the new double lot that she bought. Now both sisters live right next to each other and are each able to have their collections, but more importantly they can be together.

A fun, silly story about what really matters, The Two Mutch Sisters is a read that kids will enjoy. With adorable illustrations that highlight the sisters' two equally large but individualized collections, this book is sure to entertain. The mountains of stuff are accompanied with a fun narrative full of the most random things. While the pictures are definitely a highlight with their accurate portrayal of the story, the thing that will draw readers to the book is the lesson that can be learned from it. There is such a thing as too much stuff, as the play-on-words in the title cleverly portrays, and it's not about what you have, but the relationships you have. Toys and instruments and plants and collectibles sure will fill up your house, but it isn't until you appreciate the people you love that you will ever have enough.
