Andy and Terry are back at it again, adding 13 more levels to their previous 104-story treehouse. Along with adding a mini horse floor, a traffic school, and an all-you-can-eat level to their abode, the boys are tasked with creating another story for their publisher, Mr. Big Nose. Terry, who is usually the illustrator, wants to oversee writing this book but has a challenging time creating the ending. When the Story Police come to arrest the boys due to their story's lack of closure, they work together to evade the police while finishing a worthwhile story to publish.

With only few sentences of text per page, The Treehouse series is perfect for readers who need approachable texts but still want to read lengthier books. Each page of this novel includes detailed illustrations that take up most of the page and have lots of elements that children can analyze for a long time. This book in the series also includes some twists on classic stories, such as The Cat in the Hat, which became The Splat in the Hat, and The Tale of Peter Rabbit, which became The Tale of Peter Poopypants, adding a humorous tone the text that will be appreciated by all ages.
