Table of Contents

Articles and Essays

Special Section

Gospel-Centered “Therapist” or Gospel-Centered “Therapy”: Is there a Difference and Does It Matter?
Robert Gleave .................................................................................................................. 1

Bathed in the Light: Conceptual Considerations for the Gospel-Centered Psychologist
Edwin Gannt ..................................................................................................................... 11

Finding the Center of Gospel-Centered Therapy
Richard N. Williams ....................................................................................................... 19

Musings on Being a Gospel-Centered Therapist
Lili D. Anderson ............................................................................................................... 27

Gospel-Centered Psychotherapy: What It Is and Why It Matters
P. Scott Richards and Kristin L. Hansen ........................................................................ 33

Being a Gospel-Centered Therapist Matters: A Response to the Authors
Robert Gleave .................................................................................................................. 53

Exploring Psychology and Religious Experience:
Relevant Issues and Core Questions
Mauro Properzi ................................................................................................................. 61

Critical Thinking in Applied Psychology: Toward an Edifying View of Critical Thinking in Applied Psychology
Steve Yanchar, Aaron Jackson, Kristin Hansen, and Jamie Hansen .................................. 69

The full searchable electronic archive of the Journal is available at this address:
http://www.amcap.net