Utah Valley Metaphors

Metaphors stream into these three windowed walls.

Clouds veil Timp again, the mountain maid waiting her lover. The sun is almost fallen in the lake, and winds rattle catalpa pods.
Already, dark pushes at light.

The Rockies ring Utah Valley, blue and cold as the fear circling when I reach for a pen, when I wonder if this time I'll write a real poem. I make too many connectives!

I want to see: lake, mountains, tree. Better still, blue, yellow, red. Let me duck to avoid bumping the new moon; oh, let brain and blood ally till image and word unite.
