7-1-1989

The Route We Take

Fleda Brown Jackson

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarsarchive.byu.edu/byusq

Part of the Mormon Studies Commons, and the Religious Education Commons

Recommended Citation
Jackson, Fleda Brown (1989) "The Route We Take," BYU Studies Quarterly: Vol. 29 : Iss. 3 , Article 9. Available at: https://scholarsarchive.byu.edu/byusq/vol29/iss3/9

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by the Journals at BYU ScholarsArchive. It has been accepted for inclusion in BYU Studies Quarterly by an authorized editor of BYU ScholarsArchive. For more information, please contact scholarsarchive@byu.edu, ellen_amatangelo@byu.edu.
The Route We Take

1

The lake is a droop of space
and we are paddling in it,
remote and yearning.
An old man and woman start out
in their pontoon boat that sputters weeds. We find them again, farther on, fishing. The woman has balanced her hips on a twig of a chair. The man spits
at the water as if he has arrived at exactly the right place.

2

A root floats up,
a gladiator’s arm,
brown-studded, crooked.
Cut, it feels like cork,
or something you could
eat if you had to,
one thing standing for
another, and nothing
as horrible as it looks,
snaked underwater.
3

Two great blue heron jut fantastically, pterodactyl-beaked, carrying the sky to a cold distance. The high sun sinks its teeth in the waves. We arch our necks after the bird. The last thing we want, we tell ourselves, is intelligence, or comfort.

4

Dick says they subpoenaed the farmer who penned hogs across a feeder-stream, their raw fecal matter launching out, greening. We stop and wade to where the cold appears invisible. We actually drink from our hands, praying for innocence.

5

We follow the mink along the bank until it climbs into the tangle of roots where water has risen and fallen. We see through to clearings, stammers of light, a few sharp red cardinal flowers, a whole network of traces, not ours.
A row of old docks slope and dislodge like disproved theories. We observe the sequence of them, heavy and frail. Lily pads collect at their feet to soften the failure. The day is full of sunshine. We have our canoe, our traveling.

Toward evening, we can almost see home through the needle’s eye of the bridge: Mile Point, our twelve swans huddled, all that is, seen and unseen, all we keep learning to care for because we return to it between extremities.

—Fleda Brown Jackson

Fleda Brown Jackson is a professor of English at the University of Delaware.