10-1-1989

Capons

Jim Walker

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarsarchive.byu.edu/byusq

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://scholarsarchive.byu.edu/byusq/vol29/iss4/8

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by the All Journals at BYU ScholarsArchive. It has been accepted for inclusion in BYU Studies Quarterly by an authorized editor of BYU ScholarsArchive. For more information, please contact scholarsarchive@byu.edu, ellen_amatangelo@byu.edu.
Capons

Across the weathered chopping block
He laid his rough-skinned hand
To measure where to kill,
Then took the fowl, trussed it,
Steadied the red-handled hatchet high
And thundered down like demons
One blurred master-stroke.

I watched
Hunched behind the dirt-caked wheel
Of the green John Deere.

He strung it from the clothesline
Dripping like a cloth rag from a red-dye vat,
Wings flapping as if determined to crash to earth.
I thought of the time I fell off my bike
And cried my way into the house streaming blood
From a split chin, yellow shirt turning orange,
But this was different. His head! His head!

Past the green pasture’s fat grazing Herefords
And the smelly pigpen with its Poland China boar,
A proud Rhode Island Red strode cross the grass oblivious.

Too soon, his man’s fist enclosing mine,
Red handle in my palm,
I closed my eyes in the heft of lift,
The slash of death, and felt the hot blood
Spattering our still-clasped hands.

—Jim Walker