Ravens at Island in the Sky Canyonlands, Utah

Dixie Partridge
Ravens at Island in the Sky Canyonlands, Utah

Some mornings I don’t want to be the planner anymore, to pack the water, the cameras and binoculars, to read the maps.
I want to stand in one high spot and be comfortable in mystery as the sunstained figures that rise for miles—temples with worshippers cast in reddened stone.

We can’t be sure whether what we sense here is part of desire or fear.
Maybe what we haven’t known is that it’s all right to be part of an apparent emptiness—the unseen landscape between us and the extremes of horizon, or between this gnarled piñon and the bottom of the deepest canyons we have ever seen. What vanishings would prompt our dreams if we stayed the night on this ground, the Milky Way a slush path above the high, sheer dark?

On the trail back, two ravens startle out from cedars, their synchronized wingspan so large we shrink in our tracks as they sweep into canyon depth and disappear, literally, into the thin air.
And it feels right to say the word eternal, to wonder what comes next on the plain road to Moab.

—Dixie Partridge