Strand

Dixie Partridge
Strand

What looked like muted colors of rock stacked in river bottoms is alive
with old movement—stubbed slow-motion paddles from the stony shoulders of sea turtles overlapping three-deep in shallows.
Far back, we'd thought to cross them, quick-jumping through the small currents of our wanderings down the shore.
Now we are astonished before them—
the antique finish of splendid shells, that moment we halted—caught in their slow flex inside the ripple of rising gulf tides.

The beached landmarks of words turn strange on our tongues, ritual bearings gone awry.
What we cannot enter looms in us like stones.
We've read of their map sense, compass cues scanned by some instinct from magnetic stripes on the ocean floor.
When the heavy lids part, we look into deep slotted eyes toward the grit of slow enduring.
The sea swells around them and engulfs our feet, soft shells of our skins suddenly vulnerable.

We make our tribal way around the ancient island, wondering at the long years of navigation before this return, the feeding meadows of legend where ships are caught and swallowed in tangled kelp—the gulping deep blue and salt life of the Sargasso Sea, which has no shore for any man to stand upon.

—Dixie Partridge

“Strand” received honorable mention in the 1995 BYU Studies Poetry Contest.