2010

Shadow

Marsha D. Broadway

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarsarchive.byu.edu/cbmr

BYU ScholarsArchive Citation

This Book Review is brought to you for free and open access by the Journals at BYU ScholarsArchive. It has been accepted for inclusion in Children's Book and Media Review by an authorized editor of BYU ScholarsArchive. For more information, please contact scholarsarchive@byu.edu, ellen_amatangelo@byu.edu.

Reviewer: Marsha Broadway
Reading Level: Preschool, Primary
Rating: Outstanding
Genre: Informational; Stories without words
Subject: Shades and shadows--Juvenile fiction; Imagination in children--Juvenile fiction; Books--Reviews;

A young girl reaches overhead to click on a light in a dark attic. Her imagination takes over as she creates shadow puppets by positioning her body and objects between the light and the floor. A happy fantasy emerges from the shadows. Then a malevolent, wolf-like creature appears and frightens the girl and her imagined characters. The wolf begins to cry as everyone flees from him. The girl and her friends move closer and cheer him as they dance together. A call to dinner bids the girl to turn out the light, and she waves goodbye. The attic goes black for a while. Another click by an unseen source brings the attic creatures back to life in a dancing frolic.

This artfully-rendered, almost wordless story uses a horizontal presentation with the gutter serving as the attic floor. The upper portion of the double-spread page provides the action; the lower portion, the imaginative shadow story. The illustrations are done in charcoal, pencil, watercolor, and yellow spray paint and are digitally manipulated. Yellow surrounds and eventually envelops the girl's imagination. As noteworthy as Lee’s Wave (2008), Shadow is a picture book to revisit multiple times as it stirs creativity and imagination. Older readers will appreciate the art and the symbols used in the story. Many young people will enjoy composing their own oral interpretation of the story. Shadow is a first-purchase choice for school and public libraries and a delightful springboard to shadow puppetry.

Volume 31, no. 3 (January/February 2011)