

1-1-1999

1995-08-10

Susan E. Gunter

Follow this and additional works at: <http://scholarsarchive.byu.edu/byusq>

Recommended Citation

Gunter, Susan E. (1999) "1995-08-10," BYU Studies Quarterly: Vol. 38: Iss. 1, Article 15.
Available at: <http://scholarsarchive.byu.edu/byusq/vol38/iss1/15>

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by the All Journals at BYU ScholarsArchive. It has been accepted for inclusion in BYU Studies Quarterly by an authorized administrator of BYU ScholarsArchive. For more information, please contact scholarsarchive@byu.edu.

August 10, 1995

No one kept me from picking blackberries that clear, sunlit August morning.
No one stopped me or called my name when I stepped from the small cement porch, ringed with morning glories and portulaca, the small white dog running ahead of me toward old man Guyowski's field.

Guyowski was dead now, but I knew him long ago, when he was the janitor at the Polish Club and his daughter Stella married my uncle Paul.
Every Friday night he stood at the entry to the club, drunk and singing—sometimes in broken English, sometimes in Polish.
I can see his small, crooked body still.
But that was in 1959, when I was someone else, with no thought that I would ever leave this small town with its muddy brown river, oil-slicked, flowing through its center.

I followed the dog up the sloping hill, past old Guyowski's pigsty, a pile of odorless rocks and bricks and ancient straw moldering in the cool air, past his faded red barn, its double doors crossed with gray splintered wood, past the old fallow apple trees, bent and heavy, the small windfall apples with soft brown rotten spots dotting their green translucent skin.
Was my skin green too that morning, green with the sickly pallor of days spent in the hospital, green from the nights without sleep?
But I was alive, and I reached the field below the barn, the dog still ahead of me.
Two rabbits, small and brown, sprang from the bushes fringing the field, and the dog started after them.

This was the place I'd longed all my life to reach, the time and the place where everything coalesced, as if I'd been destined from birth to come here, picking blackberries in the warm sun, while my father breathed slow and shallow breaths into a respirator, making the float inside a plastic jar rise a few scant inches at a time.

Yellow jackets swarmed in and out of the shade, while I wandered along the field's periphery, snatching the ripe blackberries and piling them in my open palm, sometimes mistaking the yet-unripened red berries for raspberries, until I tasted one and found it bitter.
 All that I'd lost there—there in that town, in that other life—all that I'd lost suddenly rushed back, and I knew that even those losses hadn't erased this place, hadn't erased me from the place.
 I was there in that field picking blackberries, I was there in that cemetery, some of my names engraved on barely legible white stones, and I was there in that hospital, breathing up and down with my father.

At a time in my life when I feared everyone I loved would leave me, I came back to myself. I carried my handful of berries back to the house before the mother bear and her two cubs caught me pilfering, or before old man Guyowski's ghost floated from the pigsty to tell me it was time, while the sun still shone, to forgive my father.

—Susan E. Gunter, Park City

This poem was winner of the College of Humanities 1998 Eisteddfod Poetry Chair Competition for the "Losing One's Way" theme.