Prayer

Shawn P. Bailey
Prayer

It was picture day. Me: a first grader. I was all ready.
Hair combed. Shirt tucked in tight. Tie clipped on.
Mom's orders were clear:
  No getting dirty or messing up my hair
  No riding my bike. No playing in the sandpile.
  No playing outside at all.

Those were all the things, especially being forbidden,
I needed to do that day. I had already learned about
The spirit of the law; how it lets us forget the inconvenient parts and mostly obey.
So I went to the playhouse, a shed in the backyard,
    furnished with a child-sized pantry, table, chair.

It began to rain consequences:
The things you don’t plan for, but choose.
Afraid, hair and clothes already soaked in my mind,
  I said a prayer.
Not a rain prayer I had heard before, not the asking or thanking of desert people for moisture.

It was the prayer now most familiar to me:
Let me not bear the bad thing I deserve.

The rain stopped. It stopped abruptly.
The thought “coincidence” might have occurred to an adult,
    logical, sterile-minded.
That adult might have offered tepid thanks:
    “if You did that for me, I am grateful,”
    as a scientific explanation fretted in the mind’s back room.

Not me. I knew I had seen the finger of the Lord.
Despite all those farmers’ pleas—for me—He stopped that deluge.
I walked across the backyard and inside,
My eyes, like small stones, burned by that revelation.

—Shawn P. Bailey

This poem won third place in BYU Studies 2006 poetry contest.

Published by BYU ScholarsArchive, 2006