In this second book of The Rule of Three series, the people of Eden Mills are now 66 days into a world-wide blackout. The community continues to work together using their strengths and abilities to create a society that is as normal as possible in a dystopian situation. Herb, the survival leader, reveals a secret past that explains his knowledge and preparedness in the face of catastrophe. Sixteen-year-old Adam’s most important contribution to the safety of the neighborhood is his ability to fly reconnaissance in his ultra-light plane which allows advanced warning of dangers. But mysterious and troubling deaths and fires outside the walls create anxiety and fear within. It is becoming apparent that a key and trusted member of the group may be a traitor.

Walters, an award winning and prolific YA author has written a thrilling adventure story. Though this book could stand alone, reading the first Rule of Three will connect the dots. It will also leave the reader wanting to know what will happen in book three. As was his practice in the previous book, Walters develops and expands his characters as the story unfolds. Teenagers Adam, Todd, and Lori mature in responsibility and leadership as they deal with the trying circumstances of their world. Adam especially is empathetic to people and circumstances outside the walls which creates tension with those who believe that to offer help would undermine the safety of their own group. The moral and ethical questions illustrated in this book could segue into meaningful conversations between parents and children or in a classroom setting.
